The Man's Side of Married Life

Dot is Silent.

For two days Bobbie's condition continued serious. When I came home on the third I found him remarkably improved.

He was sitting in his bed surrounded by Jumbo, Sally Ann, Tommy Tucker, and Dr. Harris—all of them, including the last, dolls—lecturing to them at a great rate in a language of which I could understand only a word here and there. I was glad of the chance to talk to Dot.

"Dear," I began, almost as I had planned for so long, "there is something I have to tell you. You will be surprised and I am afraid hurt, but—"

"Why, Tom, what's the matter?" There was an intonation in my voice that frightened her.

"I've been foolish—"

"Quick! Tell me what you mean!"

"Edith," I answered and was silent.

"Oh, Tom!" I cannot describe the tone of infinite reproach and infinite sorrow in which that was uttered. "I've been foolish," I persisted. "On my word of honor, Dot, I've been foolish, but nothing more. I just have to tell you."

Then, while Dot listened without saying a word, I told her the whole story, excusing myself as little as possible.

I had just a bit too much pride left to put the blame on Edith and hide behind the old excuse of "the woman tempted me."

Force of circumstances had thrown me with Edith, and she herself had made the best of them (or the worst) but I knew that if there had not been a weak spot in me, nothing would have happened; if there had not been a faulty place in my armor Edith would never have meant any more to me than any other of Dot's friends.

As I told my story, as fully and honestly as I knew how, I glanced every now and then at Dot. She was deathly pale. She did not interrupt. She did not offer any suggestion, interpose any objection, ask any question.

Only now, as I was telling of the night when she went out with George, leaving me alone with Edith, I thought I heard a half-smiled exclamation from her.

I looked at her again, but she was silent, and I had to continue my narrative without even the help that an angry protest would have afforded.

Dot heard me through to the end without a word of reproach. I felt like a criminal telling my story before a prosecutor and judge, only in this case one person exercised both those functions.

As I concluded my story I turned to Dot with a plea to forgive me. So much depended upon what she said; I promised so much for the future.

If she would only forgive me we could begin again, upon a stronger, surer basis for the future, stronger because it would be founded on honesty and perfect frankness.

But my wife was silent.
